1864 F OAKELEY Hist Notes 60 The various gradations of Dissent and Low Churchism

Low Churchman. [Cf. HIGH CHURCHMAN] A member of the Church of England holding opinions which give a low place to the authority and claims of the episcopate and priesthood, to the inherent grace of the sacraments, and to matters of ecclesiastical organization, and thus differ relatively little from the opinions held by Protestant Nonconformists.

The term, invented as an antithesis to High Churchman, was in the early part of the 18th c used as equivalent to LATITUDINARIAN Afterwards it fell into disuse, but was revived in the 19th c, when the designation High Churchman had obtained a new currency as applied to those who inclined to the theology and ritual of pre-Reformation times In this later use, Low Churchman has for the most part been viewed as equivalent to EVANGELICAL, and has rarely been applied to members of the Broad Church School

1702 Charac Church Man 18 He is for shewing the Low Church Men in their own proper Colours 1703 DE FOE Short Way Peace Misc 463 We have had it Printed, with an Assurance I have wondred at, That the moderate Members of the Church of England, call'd Low Church Men, are worse than the Dissenters 1708 Phenix II Pref 13 It shows the first rise of that party which were afterwards called Latitudinarians, and are at this day our 'Low-Churchmen' 1710 H BEDFORD Vind Ch Eng 132 He is known to be so wretched a low Churchman, as to dispute all the Articles of the Christian Faith a 1715 BURNET Own Time (1734) II 347 All [of the clergy] that treated the Dissenters with temper and moderation were called Low Churchmen 1845 BP. 2. The rebel archangel whose fall from heaven was supposed to be referred to in Isa. xiv. 12 , Satan, the Devil Now rare in serious use; current chiefly in the phrase As proud as Lucifer.

The Scripture passage (Vulg 'Quomodo cecidisti de cælo, Lucifer, qui mane oriebaris?' A.V 'How art thou fallen from heauen, O Lucifer, sonne of the morning?') is part of a 'parable against the king of Babylon' (Isa xiv 4), but the mention of a fall from heaven led Christian interpreters to suppose that 'king of Babylon' was to be interpreted spiritually, as a designation of the chief of 'the angels who kept not their first estate'. Hence the general patristic view that Lucifer was the name of Satan before his fall The Latin word was adopted in all the Eng versions down to 1611, the Revised version has daystar

The ultimate etymology of MHG gelucke (—OHG gi-lucchi* —OTeut type galukjo-m*) is obscure So far as meaning is concerned nothing could be more plausible than Paul's view (Beitr VII 133 note) that the word is connected with G. gelingen (OHG gilingan) to succeed, turn out well or ill, as G. druck pressure with, dringen to press, schluck gulp with schlingen to swallow, ruck wrench with rungen to wrench But morphologically this assumption seems quite inadmissible, and most scholars deny the existence of etymological affinity in any of these instances Formally, the word might be cognate with LOUK v[1] or v[2], or with G locken to entice (OHG lockôn) and the synonymous OHG luccheri, but no probable hypothesis seems to have been formed to connect the meaning of the sb. with that of any of these vbs.]

[Early ME. lof, loof, app. a OF lof (Wace, 12th c.), later louf, used in sense 1 below. Senses 2–4 are common to various mod. langs.: F. lof, Sp., Pg. lo, Du loef (whence LG. loff, G. luv, Da. luv, Sw. luf). The manner of their development is obscure, and it is uncertain whether they originated in Fr., Eng., or (? most prob.) Du. Sense 5 is peculiar to Eng., and it is not easy to connect it with any of the other senses.

Certain other meanings which the word has had in Du. and Fr need to be accounted for before any hypothesis as to the primitive meaning and sense-development can be regarded as satisfactory. In early mod.Du. loef, love is explained as 'thole-pin' (scalmus, Kilian). In the 17th c. the F. lof or loo is stated to mean 'the distance from the mast to the place on the side to which the sheet is fastened when the vessel is close-hauled'. (See the quot. from Nicot in Godef, s v.) In the existing uncertainty as to the primary meaning, the ultimate etymology remains obscure; the current view that it represents a Teut. word cogn with ON. lófe palm, LOOF sb[1], depends on the doubtful assumption that the 'lof' of sense 1 was a steering paddle.]

same meaning (in Auvergne, a churchwarden) See Du Cange s vv. Luminator, Lumenaria.] In St Andrews University, a student (one in each class) who was privileged to attend the professor's lectures without payment, and to receive certain dues from the other students, in return for services rendered by him.

The Librarian of the University, Mr. J Maitland Anderson, informs us that the first student whom he has found described in the records as 'luminator' entered the University in 1697, it is, however, probable that the title goes back to mediæval times It is supposed that the 'luminator' originally provided lights and fires to the classes, but there is no contemporary evidence of this Between 1800 and 1827 his duties seem to have been those of a clerk (cf quot a 1808) The office was abolished about 1830

It is commonly stated that the University seal contains a representation of a 'luminator' holding a candle while a professor is lecturing But whether the object is a candle or something else (? a mace), and whether the figure holding it is meant for the 'luminator', seems to be quite uncertain

Called illuminator in Lyon's St Andrews (1838) 171

The ordinary view, that the spelling luncheon represents the etymological form, appears somewhat unlikely. In our quots. the earliest form is luncheon, and this appears in our quots earlier than lunch, and there is no evidence of a derivative verb in the 16–17th c. It is possible that luncheon might have been extended from lunch on the analogy of the relation between punch, puncheon, to munch, truncheon.]

Lurch (lɜ̄tʃ), sb.3 [Of obscure origin

The word app occurs as the second element of lee-larches in the first quot below, for which later nautical and other dicts substitute lee-lurches If lee-larches in Falconer be not a misprint for -lurches, it may represent an altered pronunciation of the older lee-latch, in the word of command 'have a care of the lee-latch', i e. 'look that the ship does not go to leeward of her course' (Milit & Sea Dict 1711). It seems possible that lurch originated in the compound lee-lurch, an alteration (by association with Lurch sb.1 3) of lee larch for lee-latch, which prob. contains Latch sb.2, Letch sb.2 inclination (for the sense development cf the etymological note on List sb.5)]

The 'City of Lushington' was the name of a convivial society (consisting chiefly of actors) which met at the Harp Tavern, Russell Street, until about 1895 It had a 'Lord Mayor' and four 'aldermen', presiding over 'wards' called Juniper, Poverty, Lunacy, and Suicide On the admission of a new member, the 'Lord Mayor' (of late years at least) harangued him on the evils of excess in drink. The 'City' claimed to have existed for 150 years; if this claim be well-founded, the existence of LUSH sb 2 will be authenticated for a date considerably earlier than that of our first quot Our information is from 'Sir' B Davies, the last 'Lord Mayor of Lushington']

-ly, suffix[1] (Forms . 1 -līc, -lic, 2–5 -lich, 4–5 -liche, 3–5 north. -lik(e, (3 Orm -lic, -lig, -like), 3–6 -li, 4– -ly), appended to sbs. and adjs to form adjs, represents the OE. -līc, corresponding to OFris., OS -līk (Du. -lijk), OHG -līh (MHG. -līch, mod.G. -lich), ON. -leg-r, -leg-r (Sw., Da. -lig), Goth -leik-s:—OTeut -līko-. The phonology of the OE. form, as also of the mod G. and the ON. forms, is somewhat abnormal, the frequency in use of the suffix having caused loss of the original secondary stress, with consequent shortening of the vowel, and in ON. also voicing of the guttural. A further irregularity appears in the phonetic development in ME. The normal representation of OE. -lic was -lik in northern dialects and -lich in southern dialects. These forms are found as late as the 15th century, but the form -li, -ly, which (though parallel with the reduction of OE. ic to I, and of ME everich to every) seems to be chiefly due to the influence of the Scandinavian -lig-, occurs in northern and midland dialects as early as the 13th c., and before the end of the 15th c had become universal In the Ormulum (c 1200) -lic (rarely -like) is used before a vowel and at the end of a line, and -lij before a cons.; the inflected form -like (disyllabic) seems often to be used, for metrical reasons, where grammar would require the uninflected form. In the comparative and superlative (OE. -licra, -e, -licost) the ME form had regularly -k according to phonetic law in all dialects (in the south the usual 13–14th c form was -likere, -lokest); but where the positive had the form -li new comparatives and superlatives in -lier, liest were regularly formed from it.

The original Teut. adjs in -līko- were compounds of the sb. līkom* appearance, form, body (see LICH) Thus mannlīko-* ('manly') means etymologically 'having the appearance or form of a man'; gōdlīko- ('goodly') 'having a good appearance or form', or 'having the appearance or form of what is good'. The primitive force of the suffix may therefore be rendered by 'having the appearance or form indicated by the first element of the word'; but while in the historical Teut. langs. it has remained capable of expressing this meaning, it has in all of them acquired a much wider application.

When appended to sbs, the most general senses of the suffix in all Teut langs. are 'having the qualities appropriate to', 'characteristic of', 'befitting'. In English of all periods it has been a prolific formative; the adjs. formed with it are most frequently eulogistic, as in kingly, knightly, masterly, princely, queenly, scholarly, soldierly (cf. manly, womanly with mannish, womanish); among the examples with dyslogistic sense are beastly, beggarly, cowardly, dastardly, rascally, ruffianly, scoundrelly. In OE., as in other Teut. langs., the suffix had often the sense 'of or pertaining to'; but the adjs have, so far as this meaning is concerned, been to a great extent superseded by synonyms of Latin or Romanic etymology Thus manly formerly admitted of the senses now expressed by human and masculine, for one of the older senses of timely we must now say temporal. Another use of the suffix, common to English with other Teut langs, is to form adjs. denoting periodic recurrence, as daily, hourly, monthly, nightly, weekly, yearly

When -ly is appended to an adj, the resulting derivative adj often connotes a quality related to or resembling that expressed by its primary; cf, e g, OE lēof 'dear' with lēoflīc 'lovely' (or, as it might be rendered, 'such as becomes dear') The diminutive sense found in mod G. gelblich yellowish, süsslich sweetish, though a very easy development from the original sense of the suffix, does not seem ever to have existed in English. Even in OE -lic had app. ceased to be used in new formations from adjs., the new adjs f adj +-ly that have arisen in ME. or in mod.E. seem to be from the advs

-ly, suffix [2] (Forms 1–2 -līce, 2–5 -liche, 4–5 -lich, 3–5 north. -like, (3 Orm -likе, -lik), 3–6 -li, 4– -ly), forming adverbs, represents OE. -līce, corresponding (functionally if not morphologically) to OFris -līke, OS -līko (M.Du. -līke, Du -lijk, MLG. -līke, mod l G -lik), OHG -līchō (MHG. -liche, mod.G -lich), ON. -liga, -lega (MSw. -lika, -leka, in mod Sw. superseded by -ligt, -ligen, Da. -lig), Goth. -leikō, derived from -līko- (see -LY [1]) with an adverb-forming suffix, OTeut -ō, according to some repr the ending of the abl fem. (pre-Teut -ād) or neut. (pre-Teut -ōd), according to others that of the instrumental neut. (pre-Teut -ōm).

The form-history of the suffix in Eng. is similar to that of -LY [1]· in ME the OE -līce was normally represented by -līche (southern), -like (northern), the compar. being -līker, -lukes, -loker (superl. -est)

The form -li, -ly, which was current in East Midland English in the 14th c, and became general in the 15th c, is probably due to the influence of the ON. -liga In the strongly Scandinavianized dialect of the Ormulum (c 1200) -lig and -like are used indifferently, according to the requirements of the metre Where the positive ended in -li, -ly, the comparative and superlative ended in -lier, -lest In the 15–17th c. forms like falslyer, traitorouslyer (Malory), softlier, justlier, widelier (Long Barclay's Argenis 1625), easilier, -est (R Baxter Saving Faith 1658) were common, but in later use the advs in -ly are compared with more, most, the inflexional forms being only employed in poetry or for rhetorical effect

In OTeut. an adv. with this suffix must have implied the existence of an adj with the suffix corresponding to -LY [1] In OE., however, there are several instances (e g bealdlīce boldly, swētlīce sweetly) in which an adv. in -līce has been formed directly from a simple adj without the intervention of an adj. in -lic In ME the number of these direct formations was greatly increased, and when the final -e, which was the original OE adverb-making suffix, ceased to be pronounced, it became usual to append -ly to an adj as the regular mode of forming an adv. of manner. It was, down to the 17th c., somewhat frequently attached, with this function, even to adjs in -ly, as earlily, godlily, kindlily, lovelily, lovelily, statelily, but these formations are now generally avoided as awkward, while on the other hand it is felt to be ungraceful to use words like godly, goodly, lovely, mannerly, timely, as advs ; the difficulty is usually evaded by recourse to some periphrastic form of expression In examples belonging to the 16th and 17th c it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a writer intended the adv goodly to mean 'in a good manner' or 'in a goodly manner', and there are other instances of similar ambiguity. In the words denoting periodical recurrence, as daily, hourly, the adj. and the adv are now identical in form. A solitary example of an adv f. sb +-ly [2] with no related adj. is partly. From the early part of the 16th c the suffix has been added to ordinal numerals to form advs. denoting serial position, as firstly, secondly, thirdly, etc. (cf F. premièrement, etc)

When -ly is attached to a disyllabic or polysyllabic adj. in -le, the word is contracted, as in ably, doubly, singly, simply; contractions of this kind occur already in the 14th c, but examples of the uncontracted forms (e. g doubilely) are found as late as the 17th c Whole + -ly becomes wholly, but in all other similar instances the written e is retained before the suffix, e g. in palely, vilely, puerilely. Adjs. ending graphically with ll lose one l before -ly, as in fully (in southern Eng. commonly pronounced with a single l, but in Scotland often with double or long l), dully (dʌ l¦li), coolly (kū l¦li) Adjs. of more than one syll. ending in y change y to i before -ly, as in merrily, in formations from monosyllabic adjs the usage varies, e g. dryly, drily, gayly, gaily (cf daily, which is the only current form), slyly, slily (but always shyly); greyly, grayly has always y. Another orthographical point is the dropping of the e in the two words duly, truly It is unusual to append -ly to an adj in -ic, the ending of the adv. is nearly always -ICALLY, even when the only current form of the adj ends in -ic

Lynch law. Orig. U. S. In early use Lynch's (Lynch's) law The practice of inflicting summary punishment upon an offender, by a self-constituted court armed with no legal authority; it is now limited to the summary execution of one charged with some flagrant offence

Now most commonly written lynch-law or lynch law, though the capital L is still often used

The origin of the expression has not been determined It is often asserted to have arisen from the proceedings of Charles Lynch, a justice of the peace in Virginia, who in 1782 was indemnified by an act of the Virginia Assembly for having illegally fined and imprisoned certain Tories in 1780 But Mr. Albert Matthews informs us that no evidence has been adduced to show that Charles Lynch was ever concerned in acts such as those which from 1817 onward were designated as 'Lynch's law'. It is possible that the perpetrators of these acts may have claimed that in the infliction of punishments not sanctioned by the laws of the country they were following the example of Lynch, which had been justified by the act of indemnity; or there may have been some other man of this name who was a ringleader in such proceedings Some have conjectured that the term is derived from the name of Lynche's Creek, in South Carolina, which is known to have been in 1768 a meeting-place of the 'Regulators', a band of men whose professed object was to supply the want of regular administration of criminal justice in the Carolinas, and who committed many acts of violence on those suspected of 'Toryism'.

1817 S ROANE in W Wirt Life P Henry (1818) 372 In the year 1792, there were many suits on the south side of the James river, for inflicting Lynch's law 1819 W FAUX Diary 29 Nov in Memor Days in Amer. (1823) 304 The people [of Princeton, Indiana], deputed four persons to inform him, that unless he quitted the town and state immediately, he should receive Lynch's law, that is, a whipping in the woods. 1828 J HALL Lett fr West 291 No commentator has taken any notice of Linch's Law, which was once the lex loci of the frontiers 1835 W IRVING Tour Prairies 41 'Lynch's law', as it is technically termed, in which the plaintiff is apt to be witness, jury, judge, and executioner 1839 STONEHOUSE Axholme 112 The burning Reading's house was a terrible example of what the Americans term lynch law 1879 FARRAR St Paul I 570 They seized the opportunity of executing a little Lynch law 1888 BRYCE Amer Commw III 309 Lynch law, however shocking it may seem to Europeans, is far removed from arbitrary violence

So Lynch-court nonce-wd., a self-constituted tribunal for exercising lynch law. Judge Lynch, the imaginary authority from whom the sentences of lynch law are jocularly said to proceed

PREFACE TO THE LETTER M.

THE portion of the Dictionary which treats of the words beginning with M contains 12,988 Main words, 2,986 Special Combinations explained under these, 6,422 Subordinate entries, and 3,636 Obvious Combinations; in all 26,032 words. Of the Main words, 2,838 are marked † as obsolete, and 866 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.*

Etymologically considered, the words beginning with M form a typical portion of the English vocabulary, every one of the many sources of our composite language being represented, while none is overwhelmingly predominant. The words inherited from Old English are relatively less numerous than in some other letters, but some of them occupy unusually large space in the Dictionary on account either of their great variety of senses and applications, or of the multitude of their combinations. Among them is the verb make, the article on which fills eleven pages, and would have been much longer if every subtle variety of meaning had been explained and illustrated. Other native words of importance are man, meet vb, mind sb. and vb., moon, month, mother, much, more, most. The articles on the pronouns me, mine, my, myself, and the auxiliaries may and must, contain much that is instructive as bearing on the history of English syntax and idiom. The Scandinavian element is very sparsely represented, chiefly by words of local or dialectal currency, such as marram, maugh, may (a maiden); but there are also meek, mire, and a few other words in general use. The Latin and French derivatives surpass the native words both in number and in the amount of space required for their treatment, and a very large proportion of them have an interesting history. Such instances as manner, market, master, matter, measure, medicine, memory, mend, mischief, mission, mode, model, moment, monster, mount vb., move, movement, multiply (to mention only a few of the more prominent) show how indispensable a part of the word-store of modern English has come from French. Greek derivatives are present in more than average proportions. Besides those which were introduced in the Middle Ages through the medium of Latin and French, such as magic, mathematics, metaphysics, muse sb.[1], music, mystery, there are many later formations, especially with the prefixes mega-, meso-, meta-, micro-, miso-, mono-; and the words beginning with my- are also mainly of Greek origin. Of words from Celtic there are nearly a score, but few, if any, of them would be recognized as familiar by Englishmen generally. The adoptions from Continental Teutonic, and from Italian and Spanish, are somewhat numerous. One very characteristic feature of the M portion of the Dictionary is the multitude of words from Oriental, African, Australian, and American languages. It may be noted that in Arabic ma-, mi- (or me-), and mu- (or mo-) are prefixes forming participial and other derivatives; formations of this kind, which have been adopted into English from Arabic through the medium either of European or Indian languages, are macramé, magazine, mahal, marabout, Maugrabi, minaret, miskal, Mofussil, monsoon, Moslem, mosque, Mozarabic, muezzin, mufti, mullah, musellim, Mussulman. As the sound of the letter M is one that lends itself easily to echoic use, the number of onomatopœic words with this initial is considerable.

Among the many words the etymology of which is here more fully or more accurately treated than in other English dictionaries are macaronic, mad-apple, madrepore, maelstrom, magic lantern, major sb.[1], malignant, malmsey, mammon, mammoth, melanochroi, menstruum, meter sb.[3], methyl, middling, minus, minute, mire sb.[1] and sb.[2], mire-drum, miss sb.[1], mix vb., mohair, moor vb.[1], mother sb.[2], mould sb.[2], moxa, muckender, mustachio, mutton, mystery.

The material for MA- was sub-edited (before 1888) and subsequently revised (before 1900) by Mr. Joseph Brown, M.A., of the Grammar School, Kendal, who has since sub-edited some part of S, and is now working at U; ME- and MI- were sub-edited in 1884–5 by the late Rev. T. Sheppard, Exeter College, Oxford; MO- to MOND- in 1885 by the late Hon. and Rev S. W. Lawley, Spurfield, Exminster; MONE- to MUCE- by the late Mr. J. Anderson, Markinch, Fife; and the remainder of the letter (MUCH to the end) in 1894 by the late Rev. J. Smallpeice, M A., then of St. Bees. In 1899–1904 the whole of the material from ME- to MYZ-, which in the interim had more than doubled in quantity, was laboriously re-subedited by Mr. James Bartlett, B.A., Cloverlea, Bramley, near Guildford.

Among those who have rendered help of various kinds in the later stages of preparation of this portion of the Dictionary, it is fitting to mention in the first place three honoured workers who are no longer living to receive the grateful acknowledgement which is their due. Lord Aldenham, who had been a zealous and able collaborator in the work from its beginning, continued, in spite of his advanced age, to read the proofs, and to furnish valuable suggestions, until very shortly before his death. Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., who died in September, 1906, had read the proofs for the greater portion of the letter M, supplying a great number of additional instances of the words relating to medicine and the kindred sciences. Mr. E. L. Brandreth, whose abundant work for the Dictionary has been acknowledged in the prefaces to former issues, had latterly devoted himself to the verification at the British Museum of quotations from works not accessible in Oxford, a service which since his death has been performed by Mr. W. W. Jenkinson. In the revision of the proofs continued aid has been received from Mr. A. Caland, of Wageningen, Holland, the Rev. Canon Fowler, D.C.L., of Durham, Mr. H. Chichester Hart, the Rev. Professor Skeat, and the Rev. W. B. R. Wilson, of Dollar. For information on etymological questions thanks are due to Professors Margoliouth, Morfill, Napier, and Wright, of Oxford; Prof. A. Salmon, of Reading; Hr. Verner Dahlerup, of Copenhagen; Dr. A. Kluyver, of Leiden; and Mr. J. Platt, jun., whose extensive researches into the history of words from American Indian and other remote languages have been of great service. In the explanation of scientific terms valuable aid has been received from Professors Clifton and Love, Dr. V. H. Veley, Mr. A. E. Jolliffe, and Mr. C. Leudesdorf, of Oxford, and Prof. Sylvanus Thompson, of London. Among others who have rendered help on special points are Professors Bywater and Robinson Ellis of Oxford; Sir W. R. Anson, Bart.; Sir Howard Elphinstone, Bart; Mr. Horace Hart, M.A., Controller of the Oxford University Press; Mr. E. W. Hulme, of H.M. Patent Office; Sir F. Pollock, Bart.; Mr. W. H. Stevenson, M.A., of St. John's College, Oxford; Mr. R. J. Whitwell, B.Litt., Oxford; Mr. J. Maitland Anderson, St. Andrews University; and Mr. C. W. Ernst and Mr. Albert Matthews, of Boston, U.S.A. The constant assistance of Dr. F. J. Furnivall has, in this as in all former parts of the work, been of inestimable value. Special thanks are also due to Bodley's Librarian, Mr. Falconer Madan, Mr. A. E. Cowley, and the staff of the Bodleian Library generally; and to the Editor of Notes and Queries and the many correspondents of that periodical who have furnished replies to inquiries.

The members of the editorial staff who have been engaged on M are: Mr. Walter Worrall, B.A., Mr. C. T. Onions, M.A. (who has specially prepared the portions containing the words beginning with Mis-, Multi-, and My-), Mr. W. J. Lewis, Mr. H. J. Bayliss, Mr. James Dallas, Mr. G. R. Carline, and Miss E. S. Bradley.

ADDITIONS AND EMENDATIONS.

Machit, var. of MESQUITA [2].

Macute. The Rev. W. Holman Bentley, writing from the Congo Free State, informs us that makuta is the plural of ekuta*, and denotes a bundle of ten mats of palm-fibre, still used as currency north of the Congo near the French frontier. Elsewhere the word survives only as the name of the Angola 'penny' piece or its value. Mr Bentley says that it is derived from a Congo verb kuta to tie, now obsolete, but preserved in the reversing form kitutula to untie.

Mademoiselle. Earlier example.—a 1450 Knt de la Tour (1868) 126 Madamoiselle! y praie you that ye answere not vnto this fole.

M.

M (em), the thirteenth letter of the modern and twelfth of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Greek mῦ and the Semitic mēm. The Phœnician form of the letter is 𐤌, whence the early Gr and L. 𐌌, ⋏, M. Its phonetic value has varied little; in Eng it has always expressed what was doubtless its original sound, that of the bilabial nasal consonant, which is normally voiced, though when it is followed by an unvoiced consonant it has an unvoiced ending. Like the other nasals, m is capable of being used as a sonant or vowel, denoted by ('m) in the phonetic notation here employed; but in Eng this occurs only after ð and z at the end of words (of Gr etymology), as rhythm, spasm, schism, and the suffix -ism, in these words many speakers substitute (-əm) The letter is never silent, exc initially before n in Gr. derivatives, as mnemonic

Macrocosm (mæ krŏkɒ·z'm). Also rarely in L. and quasi-Gr forms: 7 macrocosmus, 9 -cosmos [ad F. macrocosme (c 1300), ad med L macrocosmus, repr Gr. μακρὸς κόσμος* (μακρός long, great, κόσμος world) (Cf. MEGACOSM)

Although med L macrocosmus has not been found earlier than in Higden (c 1350) it must be the source of the Fr form recorded c 1300, and it seems to imply the prior existence of a Gr phrase μακρὸς κόσμος* formed in imitation of μικρος κόσμος MICROCOSM For the idea expressed, cf Macrobius in Somn Scip I xii, 'Ideo physici mundum magnum hominem, et hominem brevem mundum esse dixerunt' From the use of brevem here, and the gloss 'Microcosmum petit monde, c'est l'homme qui peu dure' (Du Cange), it may be suspected that μακρός was at first intended in the sense of 'long', interpreted with regard to duration, though the inference is not absolutely necessary, as the formal similarity of the word to μικρός would sufficiently account for its selection in an antithetic phrase However this may be, the relation of the words macrocosm and microcosm has suggested the use of MACRO with the sense 'on a large scale', in many modern words antithetic to words beginning with micro-]

1. The 'great world' or universe, in contradistinction to the 'little world' or MICROCOSM, i. e. to man viewed as an epitome of the universe

The earliest instances of the word in Eng occur in Lydgate's Assembly of the Gods (c 1420, oldest MS. a 1500), where however it is a mistake (either on the part of Lydgate or of the scribe) for microcosm (See, e g, line 1828 And as for Macrocosme, hit ys no more to say But the lesse worlde.)

Also 8 maccuta, maccute, macoute, 8-9 macuta [ad native African macuta.] At the beginning of the 18th c., said to be the name for one of the pieces of cloth used as money by the negroes of the Congo Subsequently used in the W. African trade as the name for a money of account (= 2000 cowries), and hence adopted by the Portuguese at Angola as a denomination in their local coinage (=50 reis), the Sierra Leone Company also issued (1791-1805) pieces of 1, 2, 5 and 10 macutes, the silver macute being worth about 4½*d* sterling. The account given by Montesquieu (quot. 1748), and adopted by Mill and other English writers on political economy, appears to be based on misapprehension

Madam (mæ dəm), sb Forms. 3–6 madame, 4–5 madaum Sc. madem(e, 5 maydame, 6 maddame, 4–9 madame, 4– madam [a OF. ma dame (in mod Fr written MADAME), literally, 'my lady' (see DAME, DAM), corresp etymologically to It. madonna, monna, med.L mea domina.

The spelling madame is still preferred by some writers, but the more general and convenient practice is to write madam when the word is used as English, and MADAME when it is used as a foreign title For the plural (in sense 1) MESDAMES is now used, the Eng plural is obs exc in sense 3]

1. A form of respectful or polite address (substituted for the name) originally used by servants in speaking to their mistress, and by people generally in speaking to a lady of high rank, subsequently used with progressively extended application, and now capable of being (in certain circumstances) employed in addressing a woman of whatever rank or position. (Corresponding to SIR.)

The early occurrence of DAME in the sense of mother suggests that in AF and early ME ma dame was very commonly used by children to their mother, but in the extant examples the mother so addressed is a queen or a lady of very high rank In Chaucer's time (C T Prol 376) to be addressed as madame was one of the advantages which a citizen's wife gained by her husband's being made alderman, this probably indicates the lowest social grade in which at that time the title could be claimed as a matter of customary right. In poetry of the 14th and 15th c the lover often addresses his mistress as madame Nuns (originally only the elder ones see quot c 1400) were called madame down to the Reformation

While in France the title has (with certain customary exceptions) been confined to married women, in England no such rule has been generally adopted, though there are traces of a tendency in the 16–17th c to address matrons as 'madam' and spinsters as 'mistress'

From the 17th c madam has been the title normally used in beginning or subscribing a letter to a woman of any station, except where the use of the name (as in 'Dear Mrs A' etc.) is permitted ('my lady', etc not being admitted in epistolary usage) In oral use the title now rarely occurs, from the 18th c it has been, except in very formal use, largely superseded by the contracted form MA'AM, which has itself in recent years been greatly restricted in currency, however, madam is in London and other towns still the word commonly used by salesmen to their female customers, and by persons in the position of servants to the public

In English use it is very commonly applied to a married woman belonging to any foreign nation (substituted, e g, for the Ger Frau or the Du Mevrouw) It is also frequently assumed (instead of 'Mrs') by English or American professional singers or musicians, and by women engaged in businesses such as dressmaking, in which native taste or skill is reputed to be inferior to that of Frenchwomen

Madrepore (mæ·drĭpoəi) [ad. mod L madrepora or F. madrépore (1710), ad. It. madrepora

The Italian naturalist Ferrante Imperato (Hist Nat, 1599) uses poro as a name for 'a kind of vegetable the substance of which resembles that of coral, but differs in being porous'. He evidently regarded this word as identical with the ordinary It poro, ad. L porus PORE sb , but perh. it really represented late L pōrus, a Gr πῶρος calcareous stone, stalactite Among the species of 'poro' he enumerates millepora, froudspora, and 'those plants by some called madrepores (here madrepore, but elsewhere madrepora occurs), which are tubular growths, issuing from a common stem, and attached together at their roots, so that they resemble a honeycomb'. The word madrepora (which Imperato app did not invent) seems to be f. madre mother + poro, the ending of the latter being changed to suit the gender of the sb prefixed in apposition , on this view, the other words, millepora, frondipora, etc , must have been formed later in imitation of madrepora A comparison of Imperato's woodcut of the 'madrepores' with those of the other species of poro seems to suggest that the prefix 'mother' may refer to the appearance of prolific growth characteristic of this 'plant']

1. The pretended art of influencing the course of events, and of producing marvellous physical phenomena, by processes supposed to owe their efficacy to their power of compelling the intervention of spiritual beings, or of bringing into operation some occult controlling principle of nature, sorcery, witchcraft. Also, the practice of this art

The 'magic' which made use of the invocation of evil or doubtful spirits was of course always regarded as sinful, but natural magic, i e that which did not involve recourse to the agency of personal spirits, was in the Middle Ages usually recognized as a legitimate department of study and practice, so long as it was not employed for maleficent ends. Of 'natural magic' as understood by mediæval writers, typical examples are the making of an image, under certain astrological conditions, in order to injure or benefit the health of the person represented, and the application of a medicament to a weapon in order to heal the wound made by it These things, if now practised, would still be called 'magic', though the qualification 'natural' would seem quite inappropriate On the other hand, the 'natural magic' of the Middle Ages included much that from the standpoint of modern science is 'natural', but not 'magical', the processes resorted to being really, according to the now known laws of physical causation, adapted to produce the intended effects

Magnanimity (mæ gnăni·mĭti) [a. F. magnanimité, ad. L. magnanimitāt-em, f. magnanimus MAGNANIMOUS]

†1. Used (with somewhat vague meaning) as the name of one of the virtues recognized in mediæval ethics. Obs.

Primarily this represented the Aristotelian μεγαλοψυχία (see 3), but in scholastic descriptions the notion was modified in accordance with Christian ideals, and blended with elements suggested by the etymology of the L word (animus being capable of the sense 'courage'); hence 'magnanimity' is often classed as a subdivision of 'fortitude' (so Aquinas, following Macrobius In Somn. Scip. 1 viii. § 7).

3. In the Aristotelian sense of μεγαλοψυχία (see below). Also, loftiness of thought or purpose; grandeur of designs, nobly ambitious spirit Now rare

In Aristotle the word (by modern translators rendered 'greatsouledness', 'highmindedness') expresses the attitude of one who, rightly conscious of his own great merits, is indifferent to praise except from those whose approval is valuable, regards the chances of fortune with equanimity, and, while ready to confer benefits, will seldom condescend to accept them.

Magne·to-ele·ctric, a. Pertaining to electric phenomena involving electric currents induced in conductors by the relative motion of these conductors with respect to either permanent magnets or electro-magnets.

Introduced, in 1831, by Faraday, who employed it in its most general sense for describing the currents induced by motion of conduction in conjunction with any of the following kinds of magnet permanent steel magnets, ordinary loadstones, electro magnets, the earth He used it tentatively at first in contradistinction to the term volta-electric, which he applied to the induction of electricity by turning on or turning off an electric current in a stationary coil

1831 FARADAY in Phil. Trans (1832) CXXII 139 As a distinction in language is still necessary, I propose to call the agency thus exerted by ordinary magnets, magneto-electric or magneleciric induction Ibid 173 Upon the supposition that the rotation of the earth tended, by magneto electric induction, to cause currents in its own mass 1833 Ibid. CXXIII 44, I had the pleasure, of making an experiment, for which the great magnet [a loadstone] in the museum and the magneto electric coil described in my first paper, were put in requisition 1834 — in Philos. Mag V. 349 When I first obtained the magneto-electric spark it was by the use of a secondary magnet. My principal was an electromagnet, Nobili's was, I believe, an ordinary magnet, others have used the natural magnet 1839 J F. DANIELL *Introd Chem. b. Magneto-electric current. Used by Faraday to distinguish currents generated mechanically by magneto-electric induction from those generated in a voltaic battery

1851 FARADAY in Phil Trans CXLII. (1852) 137 On the employment of the Induced Magneto electric Current as a test and measure of Magnetic Forces

c Magneto-electric machine First used by Faraday, in 1831, to denote a machine generating currents by magneto-electric induction. By later writers employed in variously limited senses.

The appellation continued to be used in Faraday's wide sense by various writers down to about 1867, when the improvements of Wilde, Wheatstone, Siemens, Ladd, Varley and others attracted much attention, and the term 'dynamo-electric machine' was introduced by Brooke This term was defined by Brooke himself to denote in general a machine 'in which dynamic energy is employed to produce an electric current' (Proc Roy Soc. XV. 409, footnote), by others, however, it has been applied to signify only such machines as embodied the principle of self-excitation and did not contain any permanent magnets Those who adopted the latter usage limited the meaning of 'magneto electric machine'; some including under that term only the machines with permanent magnets of steel, while others included under the name both these and the machines with separately-excited electro-magnets The present tendency is to confine the term strictly to the machines with permanent steel magnets. Some writers define magneto-electric machines as simply old-fashioned or rudimentary kinds of dynamos, others treat the terms as synonymous. On the other hand some writers treat 'magneto-electric machine' as a generic term, of which dynamo electric machines form a sub-class.

1831 FARADAY in Phil Trans (1832) CXXII. 160 Two rough trials were made with the intention of constructing magneto-electric machines Ibid. 163 [Under heading Terrestrial Magneto electric Induction, describes as magneto electric machines discs of copper caused to revolve, and thereby generate electric currents under the magnetic influence of the earth] 1866 CROOKES in Q Jrnl. Sci. XII 504 Magneto-electric machines, with revolving armatures, in which electro-magnets had been substituted for permanent magnets, had been constructed 1867 WHEATSTONE in Proc Roy Soc. XV 369 The magneto electric machines which have been hitherto described are actuated either by a permanent magnet or by an electro-magnet 1878 Proc Inst Civ Engin. LII 63 M Alfred Niaudet remarked that he did not agree with the distinction between dynamo-electric and magneto-electric machines In all these instruments mechanical power was converted into electricity by the action of magnetism, consequently all were both magneto-electric and dynamo electric 1878 J N SHOOLBRED Prac State Electric Lighting 6 For the older form, where permanent magnets are employed, the term 'magneto electric' machine has been retained 1880 A SIEMENS in Jrnl Soc. Telegr Engin IX 93 A constant and permanent magnetic-field is, therefore, of paramount importance, and it can be produced in the way proposed by Mr Wilde in 1863 for magneto-electric machines by employing a separate machine for exciting the field magnets of one or more similar machines 1882 S P. THOMPSON in Jrnl Soc. Arts XXXI. 120 The arbitrary distinction between so called magneto-electric machines and dynamo electric machines fails when examined carefully In all these machines a magnet, whether permanently excited, independently excited, or self-excited, is employed to provide a field of magnetic force And in all of them dynamic power is employed 1887 W B ESSON Magneto- & Dynamo electric Machines 22 In all the machines yet described, the electric currents were induced by means of steel magnets, or, as in Wilde's machine, by magnets that were magnetised by the current produced in another machine Such machines are usually called 'magneto electric' machines, to distinguish them from the 'dynamo electric' machines. 1889 Chambers's Encycl IV 146/2 The term 'dynamo-electric' was at first applied to distinguish those machines which were self-exciting from 'magneto-electric' machines, which had permanent magnets to give the field; but this distinction is no longer maintained 1891 J W. URQUHART Dynamo Constr 2 A magneto electric machine—an apparatus in which steel magnets are used to furnish the 'magnetic field'—is not strictly by common consent called a dynamo

So Magne to-ele·ctrical a., in the same sense.
